It takes a lot to get a below-average Republican elected to Virginia's top office. But consider the hurdles. 1. The incumbent, Democrat Terry McAuliffe, is a Harvard law school alum who chaired Bill Clinton's transition team. His opponent is an unknown economics professor who built his own business. 2. On paper, the state is full of Democratic voters. Every one of Virginia's 10 congressional districts voted for Barack Obama twice and Democratic gubernatorial candidate Ralph Northam by a combined 57 points in 2017. 3. There is an apparent disconnect in the general population: Republican Gov. Bob McDonnell and Democrat Northam are both held in low-to-negative esteem by most voters. 4. The Democratic base is energized, and fundraising is strong. 5. President Donald Trump has not invested much time or money in this race. The GOP nominee, Corey Stewart, is hoping that he can capitalize on the businessman's mystique in a state where most people shop at home or at Best Buy. The final strategy, and the only discernible path to victory, is to paint McAuliffe as a Washington insider, a 1970s-era liberal who will go "soft" on illegal immigration, gun control and abortion rights. Stewart's advisers call such talk "code for 'I'm a Trump guy.'" What the numbers say The latest issue of the Virginia-based nonpartisan Cook Political Report moved the contest from Leans Democratic to a Toss Up, and the R+2 district that covers all of Richmond and its suburbs has moved from Lean Democratic to Toss Up. This is the closest race that Republicans have come to winning a statewide Virginia race in some time. In a three-way race in Virginia, Democrat Terry McAuliffe holds a commanding lead, with 61% of likely voters supporting him, according to a Morning Consult poll conducted last month.
