Capturing the true excitement and brutality of the game is an essential step in delivering a FIFA that will deliver on the high quality and sense of authenticity that fans have demanded. FIFA is renowned for its realistic gameplay and simulation of real-life collisions. We sought to maximize the collision and momentum-based impact systems to create a new benchmark for football-simulation. Gathering, Aligning and Measuring Movement All movements of 22 players were captured in motion capture suits over 20 different scenarios during a complete high-intensity football game. A specially-equipped van was used to capture movements during the game. Players were filmed as they moved through a variety of situations, from attacking the opposition’s goal-line, to overtaking defenders, making runs and receiving the ball in tight spaces, or dribbling, passing and shooting. Each player’s movement was captured for a total of 41 minutes of footage. This rich data was then fed into our “HyperMotion Engine” which was used to generate and align the player’s movement data with the game engine. We used the same 3D collision and momentum physics models that shape player movements in FIFA to help capture the real-life fighting spirit in the player animations and to animate them more fluidly. Real-life movements are handled by the physics engine in the game, rather than by a set of pre-determined animation frames that add more traditional animation. We’ve also made significant improvements in the player animations and post-processing, allowing us to more precisely predict the outcome of a collision. Players can now be pushed or knocked off balance more realistically and certain trajectories of movement – such as trips and falls – are more likely to happen. We’ve also refined the player animations’ impact, especially in headers – which continue to move with the player after a collision, helping to make for more realistic animations. Authentic Physical Play Reaching out to Real Football’s Ultimate Team community we’ve been overwhelmed with great feedback and suggestions and are committed to responding to it. Our research has shown that fans want to play a game where their players run with full, dynamic, fluid, and authentic movement, and this is what you can expect to see in FIFA
