After years of battling both her blood pressure and mind, the Silver Spring resident decided to take action on the issue, and listed her two-bedroom townhome with The Kline Group at $399,000. And for the price of a single quality control inspection, that's what happened. "Everything was perfect," Kline, a 55-year-old former teacher, told local real estate magazine RealEstateNow.com about her home, which had been up for sale for less than six months. "I wanted a new place where I could relax and a check for $900 to be happy." The Kline Group is a real estate business founded by two agents and a college friend who decided in the early 2000s to partner to offer their clients "the finest quality inspections in a comfortable and experienced atmosphere with a focus on custom design." According to the company's website, the group has in recent years been sought out by buyers of homes for a variety of reasons, including interior design, condition, and staging. In recent years, however, the company has been hard pressed to find sellers who are willing to get serious about the home inspection process, according to head broker Leigh Black. Some sellers are reluctant to pay the $150 or so it takes to have a thorough home inspection. Others lack the knowledge to inspect a property themselves. And still more accept the seller's word on what a property is worth, even if they have no idea of what that value actually is. "They think they know everything, and they usually don't," Black said, "so if you put them on an inspection, they'll look for things that might not be any problems at all and not look in all the areas that might have issues." To address the problem, the founders, who are known for styling homes and selling them, started the company in 2006. That year, they were among the first dozen independent agents to sign contracts with Leading Real Estate Counselors, a trade group formed in the 1990s to try
