I like it (but it doesn't support triggers or foreign keys) and it is easy to use and powerful. The thing is that, given the tool's current capacity, it is unable to grant users enough permissions to perform their jobs. The consequence of this is that we have schemas that have been heavily modified while nobody knows who modified them. Anyway, I'd like to create a more secure data modeling environment. Here's what I'm thinking of doing: Each schema should be declared as having a "template" and "lock" attribute on each object. A template is some base value like "SMALLINT" or "VARCHAR(256)". A lock is a value like "xap" which means "no updates allowed". Each user is assigned a role. The schema will then restrict permissions on a per user basis. Each user can add/remove whatever values they want from a schema without affecting other users. A user will only be able to modify the system to where there is nothing in the db with the "lock" attribute set to "xap". I can imagine all kinds of problems with this but I'm curious what people think of this design. Thanks in advance, A: A couple of thoughts on this: Your first idea is great. You should create a column for the actual data of each type, and a column to represent its "state". Create views on the system, to reflect this. For example: CREATE TABLE dbo.data_column_1 (data_column_1_id SMALLINT IDENTITY(1,1), data_column_1_name VARCHAR(256) NOT NULL, state SMALLINT NOT NULL DEFAULT 0) CREATE VIEW dbo.data_column_1_view AS SELECT data_column_1_id,

The problem with the most recent Chrome is that I am not able to move the tab (mouse or keyboard). It is stuck at the current position and no longer the "default tab". As you can see in the image, I have tried to drag the tab from the 1st position to the 3rd position, but it is not possible. I have also tried to select more than one tab, but of course they are all unselectable. Does anybody know how to solve this? A: I finally got the solution, and maybe it could be useful for others: open the menu (normally it's the little drop down arrow) choose "Open Developer tools" so you have at the top of the developer tools window the tabs, and you can drag a tab from one tab to another.
