* **Photoshop Elements:** This full version of Photoshop lacks the more advanced features found in the full Photoshop version. Photographers, graphic designers, and photographers who don't require the full-featured features of Photoshop find this program to be an extremely simple, yet powerful, image manipulation program. It offers traditional image editing functions, such as cropping, color correction, and filtration. Like Photoshop, it is an industry standard, and many tutorial videos for Photoshop Elements cover its basic features. However, the Elements program is limited to 150,000 file formats. The good news is that Photoshop Elements creates JPEG (a well-suited format for both print and web) and TIFF (a format that's generally used for print) files. * **GIMP:** Developed by a noncommercial organization of volunteers, GIMP (pronounced _geen p_) is another open source (free and open) program that offers many of the same image manipulation tools that Photoshop does. It enables you to create vector images, which allows you to zoom in and out of images without losing quality, unlike raster images. It has a huge user community and is available for Linux and Windows.

What's New In?

Q: Algorithm for determining country from IP I have an IP address and I want to find out which country that address belongs to. Is there any good open source/free software or algorithm (preferably in C) that can do this? I know it is relatively easy to do the opposite of this; i.e., given a country code, determine an IP address. A: IPs are globally unique. The IPv4 address format is not, though, so no country could ever assign more addresses in total than there are in the IPv4 range. However, the fact that a country has assigned addresses within its assigned range is enough to determine it. This could be done by parsing a human-readable country code (e.g. FR, DE, US) to get the assigned range, and checking which IPs fall within this range. If no address falls within the range, then the country is not in that list. Alternatively, you could find the top-level domain (e.g..de or.us) of the country and check if the address matches that pattern. This will also work for dynamic domains like.com or.mobi, for which you only get the TLD by examining the address. A: In your case, I suspect that no sufficiently-powerful algorithm will be able to do this. First, the WHOIS service (which people often use to find out IP address owners) returns the information as simple text, so any complex algorithm will need to be able to write down a text representation of the results, and any text representation will be longer than the information you care about. Second, IP addresses are unique, so it is entirely possible for two countries to share the same assigned range of IP addresses. The only exception to this is if you are using a collapsed domain, which is then typically handled by the registrar. For example, if the.uk registry is already so completely loaded (ie, all available non-HPA addresses have been reserved), then all future registrations will be considered invalid. I do not believe any algorithm will be able to determine IP address ownership from IP address alone. 1.
