Diurnal variation in phytochrome content and allocation to leaves in potato (Solanum tuberosum). Internode lengths of trenched potato (Solanum tuberosum) plants showed a photoperiodic response, with elongation in long-day conditions at the transition from the vegetative to the reproductive phase. This response could be correlated with the phytochrome content of the phloem and xylem. In the first experiment the phytochromes A1 and A2 in phloem and xylem were measured by fluorescence spectrophotometry in the midribs of the nodes between the shoot apex and the third leaf. During the transition, A2 increased and A1 decreased in the phloem, while the xylem contained no significant differences in phytochromes. In the second experiment, internode lengths were correlated with the sizes of leaves in the tip and nodes. The ratio between total chlorophyll and phytochrome in the leaf blade and in the stems was measured with use of a laser-beam analyzer, and the results obtained were compared to phytochrome contents of the whole plant. An increase in chlorophyll ratio during day length transitions was correlated with the increase in phytochrome content.
