A: This sounds like a hardware issue, in that BIOS is not seeing the hard drive. Unfortunately, booting from the hard drive itself is useless if that's the issue. The main reason is, the bootloader is stored on the hard drive, as is the kernel for most modern operating systems. If booting from there doesn't work, chances are it'll be a hardware issue. Boot from the installation DVD, select "Repair Disk", and select "Customize" from that. In the first window, choose what drive, and try "boot from first disk", "boot from 1st hard disk", or something similar. If that works, continue on with the rest of the options there. The other obvious option is to just start up that computer in a Windows OS, and see if it still operates. If so, hardware may be okay, but if it doesn't, there are a few options to try. The following instructions are for Windows, but should be nearly identical for Linux or macOS. The commands are just going to be used to run a disk check of the hard drive(s), so it's important to back up everything first. Open up an administrative command prompt (you can get to one by opening up Run, type cmd, and press Enter) run `chkdsk /r c:` Where c: would be the drive or partition that the disk is located on. Run this command from a command prompt, not a file explorer window. When it finishes, it will say "Cleaning up the volume". Click OK to go to the next window, and press Enter. run `chkdsk /r c:` This is similar, but will tell you where on the hard drive the problem is (assuming the message is something like "FileSystem consistency check: C:\Windows (NTFS)"). run `chkdsk /r c:\windows` (same thing except you put in the full directory path of Windows) run `scandisk /f c:` This will check the volume for errors. Run `gparted` (available in your software center or within the accessories menu). On a terminal window, run "`sudo gparted`". This should open a GUI windows to show your hard drives partitions. Check that the drive that has the CD/DVD you used to install Ubuntu is being reported on both the hard
