Always call your dealer, the manufacturer or the Power-Sport® Service Center. The goals of this proposal are to elucidate the role of protein kinase C (PKC) in the regulation of cell proliferation and differentiation. A quantitative assay of PKC activity using phorbol ester-treated PC12 cells will be developed. This technique will enable the growth inhibitory effect of PKC antagonists to be quantitatively assessed. The effects of PKC inhibitors on the induction of differentiation of PC12 cells will be examined. The regulation of PKC activity by protein kinase A (PKA) in PC12 cells will also be investigated. A protein-tyrosine phosphatase (PTP) inhibitor will be used to determine if PTP controls the PKC pathway. A second goal will be to examine the role of PKC in the regulation of several G-proteins in Rat-1 fibro

Comparison of anticoagulation protocols in the management of patients with acute non-massive pulmonary embolism. To compare anticoagulation protocols for the management of patients with acute non-massive pulmonary embolism (PE). This was a retrospective analysis of patients admitted with acute non-massive PE in two regional hospitals, between 2002 and 2007. One hospital is a teaching hospital and the other is a district hospital. Anticoagulation protocols at each institution differed in that warfarin was initiated at varying PT 40 s and a dose of 40 mg enoxaparin was administered routinely. There were a total of 199 patients included in the analysis. The incidence of PE increased from 22.8% between 2002 and 2003 to 27.6% between 2004 and 2007. Time from first presentation at hospital to warfarin initiation ranged from 0 to 14 days and warfarin was well tolerated. A prothrombin time (PT) > 40 s at commencement of warfarin and a dose of enoxaparin > 40 mg were independently associated with an increased risk of recurrent symptomatic PE. Despite differences in protocol between the two hospitals, there was no significant difference in the rate of recurrence of symptomatic PE. Patients are well managed with current anticoagulation protocols, despite substantial local differences in protocol. Further research is required to evaluate optimal anticoagulation strategies for the management of patients with acute PE. The use of agent-based models to aid in the development of fire management strategies in fire-prone areas in New South Wales, Australia. The way fire management has evolved over the past 20 years has led to a challenge in the recognition of fire incidents within the fire management community. The approach to modelling fire in Australia has largely been in the application of single-agent models. A pre-requisite to the design of robust fire management strategies is the identification and design of fire-prone areas. Fire-prone areas, which are generally defined to be the areas of moderately high to high fuel load that often coincide with fire-prone landscapes, are defined on the basis of the proportion of the landscape which is fire-prone. The approach to developing fire management strategies is two-pronged. These are the development of rationally designed fire management strategies using different layers of risk, and the design of more efficient incident management systems. The results of
