Ethical guidance regarding children's involvement in psychological research is provided through the example of the development of a mouse-tracking measure. Energetic cost of sperm cell shaping and shaping-induced "stretch" in mouse epididymal spermatozoa. The use of scanning (or transmission) electron microscopy (SEM) and rapid scanning single polarograph (RSP) to estimate the movement of Ca^{2+} ions through the membrane of mouse sperm cells and "stretch" (a rapid increase in the volume of cells) as a result of flattening during sperm shaping has previously been described. In the present study, a variety of other estimations of cytosolic and mitochondrial free energy and osmotic potential have been determined. A linear relationship has been demonstrated between the capacity of sperm cells to eject Ca^{2+} ions and the capacity to eject protons into the medium. Sperm cells that were prevented from inverting their plasma membrane during 90 min of shaping showed no increase in the volume of the cells. Mechanical stretching of rapidly-extruded or spontaneously-extruded sperm cells by maintaining them at the point of ejaculatory orgasm showed that the volume of the cells did not change as a result of the known increase in concentration of intracellular Na^{+} ions. At the points of ejac
