“In ‘HyperMotion Technology,’ we are marrying player behaviors from world-class game creators with our new physics engine,” said Peter Eige, Senior Producer at EA SPORTS. “This enables us to present a more nuanced game experience by leveraging all the data we have collected from FIFA players. For example, ‘HyperMotion Technology’ takes into account the height, speed, and momentum of a player’s running, and how that affects a player’s accelerations, decelerations, and techniques. It also allows us to more realistically predict how a player’s physicality will alter their final footwork.” The player movement data collected from the 22 test players is also used to adjust gameplay time of day and weather conditions. FIFA players can create their own play style using all of the tools and resources that are available to them in a live game, and gain a more realistic experience playing their favorite sport. “A real-life player suit is not a perfect surrogate of the ball or the player's movement,” says Eige. “But through the combination of motion capture technology and data-driven AI, we are taking the most authentic and complete data possible and using it to enhance gameplay in FIFA 22.” FIFA 22 also introduces the Playmaker, a new way for players to create and control their own offensive moments in the game. The Playmaker has an advanced set of offensive moves and tactical kicking skills that allow players to dictate possession and create goal scoring opportunities. The Playmaker will also be capable of picking up free kicks, recoveries and throw-ins. "For years, we've been asking the question, 'How can we create the most immersive football experience possible?'," said Seb Rochford, Senior Producer at EA SPORTS. "When this technology is combined with the individual skill of each player and the immense gameplay knowledge gained over the past two decades, you end up with this completely unique and new game experience." “We are proud to introduce players to the newest FIFA version with this new evolution of our game engine and mechanics.” FIFA 22 will be available worldwide on PS4™, Xbox One and PC on September 27.
