* **The top toolbar.** _ Photoshop supports many controls, including sliders, text boxes, and brushes, on the top toolbar. Some of these controls have optional menus that can be accessed by clicking and dragging, and others have keyboard shortcuts. You can change the default keystrokes for many of the controls by going to the Preferences dialog box (Edit → Preferences). To see a list of the default shortcuts, click the Show Command Shortcuts button in the bottom of the Preferences dialog box and press F7, or choose Edit → Preferences → General. * **The panels.** _ The interface consists of two panels: the tools panel and the document panel. These panels can be configured to be divided into different panels and then moved, resized, and even deleted. You can split one of the panels into three so that you can view more of the area you're working in at one time, but it may not make much sense when you're working with many layers. You can always bring up or close the panels by clicking on the icon in the bottom-right corner of the document or tools panels. Also, check out the Tools panel (refer to Figure 4-9) to see all the tools you have. Figure 4-9. A tool in Photoshop is called a tool. The tools here are not actually tools. Instead, they are Photoshop's drawing tools, which are another type of drawing tool. Each drawing tool provides its own unique function in the workspace, and you need to use only a few of them. Although it's common parlance to refer to these drawing tools as tools, they are not tools in the traditional sense and should not be referred to as tools. * * * # About this Book This book begins with a brief history of Photoshop and a quick primer on the basics of using Photoshop. Q: How do I count the amount of occurrences of any character in a string in C? I'm trying to write a program that counts how many occurrences of any character in a string, i.e. it will count how many E, R, F, and L there are in the string. The problem is I am getting a segmentation fault (core dumped). The code is: #include #include int main() { char str[256]; int *j = (int*)malloc(sizeof(int)); printf("Input any character, type E for end: "); scanf("%c", &*j); int count = 0; while>(*j+1)!='E') { while(*(str+count) == *j) { count++; } while(*(str+count) != *j) { count++; } j++; } printf("# of occurrences:%d", *j); } And the problem is with the loop in the end of the program. It should keep looping until 'E' is found, and count how many occurrences of any character in a string were found. The issue: I am getting a segmentation fault (core dumped). A: The segmentation fault (core dumped) occurs in this loop: while(*(str+count) != *j) { count++; } you are incrementing count each loop and not checking what your variables are. (str is a char array) In addition to that, you should not cast the malloc return from NULL. Edit: In addition to malloc return, you are trying to access a pointer that is outside of the bounds of your allocated space. A: The problem is that you are indexing into your string with str+count, which means you

Pages Sunday, February 3, 2018 I'm not going to lie, when I saw that the Post Beach saw a big storm come through their little parts of the island, I was kinda worried (stoked as well). I was ready for the wind and the waves to be huge, but they were only a little tame. We were stoked though, the big waves weren't too bad. It was pretty windy but we were able to hang tight at the bar. Always a good time! Friday, December 8, 2017 Long time, no post. It's been a while! We've been very busy lately. Life has taken it's own path for us over the last few months and it's made a whole lotta change! We can't wait to share it with you as soon as we can. We want to give a big thanks to everyone who has supported and inspired us over the last year. We couldn't have done it without you and we are so grateful for you! Tuesday, October 11, 2017 Yup, we got in the boat and left behind all the bullshit and headed out to the ocean, we're ready to spend the whole day out in the water! It's been a while! I'm not really big into the ocean, but I'm always ready to try something new and spend time on a boat is a new experience for me! So we brought our trash cans and boogie boards and got out there ready to play in the water! It was one of the most relaxing day of my life! I highly recommend it!Q: Why is the space in front of the "i" smaller than that of the "g"? The explanation given was that by using the word "i" in a series of "n" we give the impression that the letter "i" in the former series is closer to the "n" than the "g" in the latter series. Why does this occur? A: I was taught that the "i" is just as close to the "n" as to the "g". But I think that's wrong, because it distracts from the main reason. When we want to stress a syllable, we just move the stress towards it. The syllable is almost not stressed, but the articulation of the sound is accentuated. We achieve this by moving the stress markers and retarding
