Support for several online movie databases Automatically import movies from your PC Export lists to CSV and PDF format Automatically search movie covers from the web Load movie reviews Supports movie posters from the web1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a technique for an active matrix display, which requires a reduction in power consumption, and improvement in image quality in a display of a video type. 2. Description of Related Art Recently, an attention is paid to an active matrix display. In this type of display, on the basis of each of pixels that are arranged on a screen of the display with a matrix, an active element is arranged for each of the pixels, and a quantity of video signal that is supplied to each of the active elements in the pixel is controlled by the active element. Namely, at a constant drive voltage, the active element such as an EL (Electro-Luminescence) element emits light to express a video on the screen, while a low drive voltage is applied to other active element such as a TFT (Thin Film Transistor) to keep the light emission of the EL element off. This type of display exhibits, with respect to a reference power voltage (for example, 5V) when the EL element is off, a slope of a curve of luminance (gradation) against drive voltage that is steep in a low voltage region, in a partial range from the reference power voltage to a power voltage of 5V. Accordingly, in a gradation expression, it is possible to express a gradation by setting a reference voltage to an appropriate voltage for performing high-luminance display (high-luminance gradation) in accordance with the reference power voltage, and it is possible to express a gradation by setting a drive voltage to an appropriate voltage for performing low-luminance display (low-luminance gradation) in accordance with the reference power voltage. In the active matrix display, when displaying the video at the reference voltage of high luminance, the EL element receives a greater current, and, thus, the EL element emits light with a higher luminance. In contrast, when displaying the video at the reference voltage of low luminance, the EL element receives a smaller current, and, thus, the EL element emits light with a lower luminance. Therefore, in the active matrix display, in accordance with the
