N O T E S 1. Prerequisites: Windows 7/Vista/Windows 8/Windows 10. 2. You must have access to the internet to download the latest version of the software. 3. TheÂ .When good writing meets bad deadlines Some deadlines are the best kind: You get a rejection letter on the very day you expected it. Sure, your first draft probably was crap, but what the heck, the deadline will force you to hit the ground running. Not so, however, with this week's two most-chilling deadline: the June 27-July 1 "National Parks on the Recreation Month" to celebrate its 150th anniversary. The stupendously prompt response of the National Park Service to the park media department last week was that an agency-wide memo was coming this week. That memo? The list of rules that, a week before the deadline, parks have to adhere to in order to be in compliance. I call this the "bad deadlines" rule, by the way, because normally their clarity makes them great. Look, your deadline only says to "comply" and not to "abide by." But the latter is implied. Now, I get the intent. Parks officials want to promote the National Parks Service and remind visitors of the merits of enjoying the outdoors. They want to encourage nationwide events surrounding the 150th anniversary, like the National Park Service's newest, "One Park, One Summer: 150 Years of National Parks" program. But that's how they get themselves into trouble. This program has been around since September, so unless parks were actively promoting it, local media should have been aware of it. Lucky for those who missed it, the National Park Service released a list of all the National Park Service-sponsored programs, the activities and events that visitors can partake in throughout the month. I can't speak for everyone, but all I'm seeing is that the NPS will be telling people that they have to be in one of these programs in order to be allowed to visit the parks. When the goal is to get people to visit the parks (and I'm all for that), you want rules that are clear. But this would not be clear at all. It's become common that once a year the NPS has a "Year of the Park"
