I have a software running on a physical machine, running on Windows, and I have the SDK for the physical device. The SDK is C++ with some CLI commands. In order to test certain basic functionality I need to get a file from a physical disk and put it in RAM, I also need to be able to see if the file is changed. I also need to be able to read a whole disk in and process it in the RAM - not just a file or directory. The Problem with C++ is that I cannot read a file into memory using C++ - I can use libraries that read in files into memory. I have an API to list and read files on disk, but no API to read a file to memory. Is there a way to accomplish this without using a library (and without making my own library)? A: Yes, you can use raw i/o. Depending on which OS you are using, there may be a version of CreateFile where you can specify the FILE_FLAG_NO_BUFFERING. This will mean that if you use ReadFile/WriteFile, you will not have to block on I/O if any other system processes are requesting access to the same volume
