Q: Android to Objective-C equivalent I'm working on a cross platform app in Objective-C where I'd like to add a feature like Android. That is, in the app, you can have your contacts stored locally, in the cloud or both. You can then simply tap a button, create a new account, etc. etc. - and then the app moves the contacts to your new account.

Is there an open source library in Objective-C I can use for this? I'm open to the idea of keeping things simple and just using UIWebView with some javascript or cross-compiling Objective-C to C++ and using a WebKit instance. However, there are some related issues like different device capabilities (since you could have a cloud and local store), cross-platform compatibility, etc. that I don't know if it'll work.

A: Ok, I figured this out. In case anyone else ever wants to do this, here's the solution. I made a sample app that demonstrates how to use the Android contacts framework. You'll need to add the to your manifest. That gets you a list of all the accounts you've created, and you can pull them down with List accounts = AccountManager.get(this).getAccountsByType("com.my.contacts.provider"); Once you get your accounts, you can import them into your app by creating a new AccountManager and adding the accounts like so: AccountManagerFuture future = AccountManager.get(this).addAccountExplicitly(accounts.get(i), null, null, null); You should also create a new AccountManager before you import them: AccountManager am = AccountManager.get(this);

"The US coalition said that the majority of fighting has finished and the operation will be launched soon," Defense Minister Khaled al-Obeidi told reporters at the heavily fortified Zankiya military base north of Baghdad. "But the reality is that the operation is not finished yet." The military offensive launched on Oct. 17 aims to retake Mosul, the largest city held by the Sunni Muslim extremist group in Iraq. The United Nations says the battle has displaced more than half a million civilians, many of whom are living in harsh conditions in camps. "It's not an easy work in the face of thousands of Daesh fighters who intend to fight and sabotage the work of the Iraqi forces," Obeidi said. A representative for the US-led coalition did not respond immediately to a request for comment. Obeidi was speaking shortly after Iraqi troops were hit by a car bomb in Baghdad's northeastern neighborhood of Dora, which was targeted at a security checkpoint, according to the Defense Ministry. Two Iraqi security forces were killed and 18 people injured, including civilians, in the car bomb attack, the ministry said in a statement. The blast was followed by clashes in which one person was killed and three were wounded, the statement said. Dora is a stronghold of the Shiite Muslim militias known as the Popular Mobilization Units, which were formed after the defeat of
