The basic idea behind such so-called nanocarriers is that they can be designed to deliver a drug carrier vehicle to a specific site in the body, rather than being administered systemically. Delivery vehicles, whether they be micro- or nano-sized, are present in the vasculature and can be visualized using magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) techniques (see Gulliksen, et al., Cancer Research, 54:2968-2973, 1994). Because the MRI technique relies on the T2 relaxation properties of the carrier, it does not require any tracer drugs. U.S. Pat. No. 5,256,132 to Gallion describes the use of temperature dependent drug release from a polymeric matrix in the delivery of a therapeutic agent. The U.S. Pat. No. 5,256,132 describes a perfusable or permeable polymer matrix which is capable of sustaining the release of a therapeutic agent at a regulated, predetermined, and/or constant rate during a selected time period. The matrix is preferably formed of a polymeric hydrogel material which is capable of sustaining, and effectively regulating the release of a therapeutic agent. The patent provides compositions, and methods for their synthesis, which may be made into polymeric delivery matrices or devices. The therapeutic agent may be incorporated into the polymeric hydrogel matrix prior to, or after, or simultaneously with the controlled release of the therapeutic agent. The thermoresponsive systems described therein are matrixes that contain a polymer and a therapeutic agent that undergo an aggregation, gelation, or coagulation transition in a predetermined range of temperatures, allowing for a controlled release of the therapeutic agent. For field crops, these traits may include resistance to diseases and insects, resistance to heat and drought, reducing the time to crop maturity, greater yield, and better agronomic quality. With mechanical harvesting of many crops, uniformity of plant characteristics such as germination, stand establishment, growth rate, maturity, and plant and ear height is important. Traditional plant breeding is an important tool in developing new and improved commercial crops.Q: How to properly check an ORM database size I'm planning to monitor the speed and the size of the mySQL database used by a live web site. The thing is that I got some difficulties with the info I've found. First, let me explain the context: The web site has an Apache / PHP 5.3.29 + mod_php + MySQL 5.5.45 application with a MySQL wrapper. I created a batch file that gather the current data from the MySQL database and, through a PHP script running on a Debian VM, put them on a daily basis on a web page. I would like to compare the current data with the previous data and calculate the size of the MySQL database excluding data that I expect to be not changing. My first approach was to download the data from the MySQL server to my web host, comparing the two files and then manually count the differences. The amount of data I'm checking is not worth to make a very long script, so I was thinking to use the size of the file to check if it was changed or not. I found about the du command, so I'll look for the difference in size between the two files, but I haven't got a good idea how to do that. The only code I can use is PHP 5.3.29's inbuilt function to get the size of the file but it returns the size of the file in bytes rather than in KB or MB.
