Minecraft 1.6.1 Cracked [Full Installer] [Online] [Server List] 2018 no survey Q: How is kcalloc different from malloc? I am trying to figure out how to allocate buffers of a given length using the kcalloc API. All examples I have seen use something like struct buffer *buf = kcalloc(sizeof(struct buffer), GFP_KERNEL); Are there any differences between what I am doing here and what would be done with malloc? Why would it be necessary to use kcalloc? I'm having trouble finding any documentation to explain this. A: The difference, it seems, is that the caller of kcalloc has to specify the type of the buffer to be allocated. For example, something like this: struct buffer *buf = kmalloc(sizeof(struct buffer), GFP_KERNEL); will not work. kcalloc is provided to allow the user to allocate any type of buffer. In your example, you want to allocate a struct buffer, which is a special type of structure. Q: How to tell if an Action results in a Wait I have a Visual Basic.NET Windows Forms application where I want to pause some stuff until a background operation is completed. How do I tell if I'm in a callback from an Action for a Windows Forms control or a callback from Action for a Windows Forms Application? Something like this... public Form1() { InitializeComponent(); var action = Action.Custom3; Action.AddToWaitList(action); var event = new Windows.Forms.StatusChangedEventHandler(status_changed); Action.AddToCallbackList(action, event); } private void status_changed(object sender, Windows.UI.Xaml.StatusChangedEventArgs e) { Action.Remove
