ORLANDO, FLORIDA — An Orlando man who had been charged with “swatting” threats to police and a school was released from jail after police noted evidence that his claims were false. According to the Orlando Sentinel, an Orange County judge on Thursday night ordered the Orange County Sheriff’s Office to release Jameel Ades of Orlando after he claimed he would turn a gun on a police SWAT team. The judge found that there was no evidence that Ades was in possession of a gun, and that he posed a threat to public safety. Sheriff’s officials believe that Ades, who they say is associated with a group of other swatters, had been playing with the idea of alerting law enforcement of phony threats — all for kicks.

What's New in the?

Cables for transmitting high-voltage electric signals, such as power cables, communication cables, and the like are often spliced together by a splice connector. In many instances, it is desirable to provide a mechanical lock to hold the connecting cable segments together in a spliced condition, but such a mechanical lock must not interfere with or mar the electromagnetic and/or physical properties of the connecting cable segments. A common method of preventing detaching of the spliced connecting cable segments is the provision of crimp connections, which are formed by crimping the cable segments together and provide an effective mechanical lock. However, crimp connections are known to cause deterioration of the insulation material in the cable segments to a degree that is dependent on the type and degree of the crimping, and are therefore undesirable in many cases. In order to avoid the use of crimp connections, crimping tools and processing equipment are available for crimping the connecting cable segments together. However, the use of such crimping tools may often be undesirable in terms of space, weight and cost, and the crimping process itself is difficult to automate. It has also been proposed to provide a splice connector with a mechanical locking mechanism that does not involve crimping, but that instead relies upon a combination of resistance to being pulled apart and/or twisting away of the connecting cable segments. A splice connector is known from U.S. Pat. No. 5,527,351, for instance, that includes a pair of connecting cable segments that are each provided with an aperture and that are brought together by a support having a depending hook which is pivotable from an inoperative position in which the hook is disposed inside the apertures into an operative position in which the hook is disposed outside the apertures, such that the hook engages the apertures to prevent pulling apart of the connecting cable segments. The support has a fixed hook and the pivoting of the hook from the inoperative position to the operative position involves a pressing operation, which ensures that the hook engages the apertures and prevents the connecting cable segments from being pulled apart. A problem with this solution is that, in order to pivot the hook between the inoperative and operative positions, the support must be provided with mechanical locking means to lock the support in a predetermined angular position, which in turn prevents pivoting of the support. Thus, in order to be able to turn the support and thus to enable the hook to engage the connecting cable segments in the desired manner, the support
