For many years, systems have been developed for delivering the contents of a container or package to a living being. For example, a baby bottle is often attached to a nipple that a baby suckles on to obtain nutrition. In this regard, these systems have been effective for supplying certain beneficial nutrients to the baby. In the past, however, these delivery systems have been relatively unsafe due to the potential of delivering harmful substances. These problems have been dealt with by strengthening the container and/or strengthening the delivery system. However, these containers and systems have tended to be difficult to use. For example, the necessary strengthening has often caused the container and/or delivery system to be relatively expensive and/or difficult to manufacture.

Q: How to access an element from a list which is in a class in python
Imagine a list of ['name','age',...]
L1 = [] L2 = ['name', 'age'] L3 = ['name', 'age','mobile'] L4 = [('shoe','shoe')]
I want to print the name of the people whose age is greater than 18. Since the elements are in a list, I wanted to print the name (shoe for example) of the corresponding element. I tried with: L1[0] print ('name',L1[0]) or L3[1] print ('name',L3[1]) but it doesn't work. How can I print the name of the elements inside the lists?
A: In this case, I think you want to compare each element to the next one. It is a lot easier to use python's built in function next: L4[1] # next(it) next(L4) # next(it) next(L4) # next(it) next(L4) # next(it) next(L4) # 'mobile' Just for extra credit, you could write something like this: def element_next(elm): return next(it for it in L2 if it[0] == elm) But in this case, I recommend you read the documentation for things that are built in: Let

And so the experts are out again, writing post-modern versions of the Great Books that will later be used to puncture the Great Men of Western civilisation. When Scott McLeod or the Liberal Party MP (later to be prime minister) John Hewson publishes their long-awaited defence of Western civilisation, they may be as surprised as anyone at the contents as the latter makes John Locke look like Galileo. "The fundamental premise [of The Great Escape] is that it is better to be a violent criminal than a bourgeois" is the opening line of the film, before being undercut by various scenes of murder, torture, and beheading to be set against a hazy, whirring soundtrack. "It's the age-old and somewhat repellent theme that this is an era when we could all have paradise if we all paid our taxes." "People with advanced degrees don't make good workers." "When you have a woman at the helm, at least someone's looking after the place, which is more than one can say for any other administration, especially the present one." This last line of wisdom is perfect, neatly joining a number of similar quotes from the pro-market intelligentsia of the modern era. "'Oh, yes, Les, it's just a matter of going to the sales.' 'Aha! The sales have gone sour.' 'Nonsense, Les. They're in the bag.' 'I'm not saying that, Les. I'm just saying it's a matter of going to the sales.'" Hewson's book is divided into three parts. The first is an attack on tyranny (Frankenstein), and the moral relativism that is used to justify it (Brave New World). His second part centres on John Locke. It is here that Hewson displays what Groucho Marx would call his only talent - punning. The phrase "a social contract" appears several times in this part, where Hewson notes that Locke never described a "social contract", and that his name may have given rise to this confusion. There are also lots of words with the word "con" in them, such as "contract", "contractarianism", "conation", and "conception". But the real gem is the fact that the phrase "a social contract" was coined by French revolutionary Jean-Jacques Rousseau. Where does that leave us? If you were going to
