In the manufacture of integrated circuits, a good die (IC) yield is a measure of the proportion of good dice that are produced. In order to increase the yield of good dice, it is known to test the integrated circuits to screen out faulty dice prior to further assembly and attachment to the system in which the dice are used. During production of an integrated circuit in a wafer form, a plurality of dice are simultaneously produced and are formed from multiple layers that are stacked on top of each other to form the integrated circuit. One of the layers is the metal layer, typically aluminum, that is used to connect the various transistors of the integrated circuit. In order to test the die or integrated circuit, a probe or test pin is pressed against the metal layer. The probe is connected to an external measuring device that applies a test signal to the probe and measures the output of the probe. This test signal is preferably a square wave signal that produces a large change in the output signal in the frequency range of the signals in the integrated circuit. The output signal is then measured to determine the quality of the integrated circuit. Such testing of integrated circuits is well known. A problem associated with testing integrated circuits using probes or test pins is that the probe or test pin must physically contact the metal layer in order to conduct the test signal. It is known that bond pads are typically formed on the integrated circuit in order to allow the necessary connection to be made to the integrated circuit. In forming this connection, a wire or other conducting material is used to connect the bond pad and the metal layer. By being in direct contact with the metal layer, the conducting material may be damaged or degraded during the test. One known method for preventing damage from a test is to incorporate a retentive bond into the bond pad. A retentive bond is a bond that creates a mechanical connection between the bond pad and the metal layer, and is formed by applying a vacuum to a small area around the bond pad. Such a vacuum forms a positive seal and causes the metal layer to be deformed around the bond pad, forming a capillary tube and a mechanical connection between the
