This article is more than 6 years old This article is more than 6 years old A lawyer for the two men accused of being the London Bridge attackers has told jurors that both men "were confused, and lost control" and had a "bad day". Makrams Khan, 27, and Khuram Butt, 25, deny carrying out the atrocities after crossing the border from Syria in a car hired by the attackers. But the pair, who deny murder and attempted murder, claim they did not know they were taking part in a terrorist attack and that they had no links to Islamic State (Isis). Khan, of Hove, East Sussex, and Butt, of Cardiff, have said they were motivated by the "media bombast" of British foreign policy in Syria and Iraq. Khan told the court he had been to Syria with his cousin, Sajid Badat, 27, and three friends, but had returned when he became "bored". The court has been told the group were drunk when they arrived in the UK in July last year. Butt is alleged to have driven the Ford Fusion in which three attackers carried out the attack on 6 June last year. The car was driven by another man, Youssef Zaghba, 22, of Italy, who has also pleaded not guilty to murder. "Mr Khan, like Mr Butt, was confused and lost control in the parking lot on London Bridge of the man who was known to him, and to his friends," said Stephen Vullo, QC, for the two men. "Let me make it clear here: Mr Khan did not mean to kill. He was drunk at the time and had a bad day. He'd spent the day with his friends in the pub and on the way home his car was found at the bottom of the embankment by a London Bridge worker, now known to be one of the victims in this trial." The barrister said Khan had returned to Syria about a month later with Butt. "Mr Khan left his passport behind in the pub that day. He was now un-personed. He had gone from being a human being, doing ordinary things, to being a fighting entity." He said he had been in contact with a sergeant in the military police, based in London, who had helpfully told the barrister that there was little chance of retrieving Khan's passport from Syria, but they could

It's becoming more difficult for e-book readers to replace paper books. One factor in that is Amazon's Kindle e-book reader. The models are getting better, but is that making a dent in book sales overall? In the short term, yes, says Bookseller, because those who had already bought the paper book will try to find the digital version for free. But eventually they'll give up and move back to paper. That's what we found out last month, when Amazon announced that, for Kindle owners who had previously purchased a paper copy of a book, the company would send them digital versions for free. Since then, we have been working with a few booksellers around the country to see how that has impacted book sales overall, and the answers have been mixed. Some stores say they've seen a big increase in sales of digital books, while others say that's not been a factor. To put that in perspective, Amazon has reportedly given away 1.1 million free digital copies of Moby Dick, so on one level, Kindle owners are giving e-book readers a shot in the arm, but on another, they're just trying to replace what they already bought. The ratio of physical to digital book sales varies from store to store. The Tribune Tower Bookstore in Chicago, which prides itself on publishing independent authors, said for the past two weeks it's been getting about 50 percent of its sales in the digital category. The rest are paper copies, sold at a higher price. The Chicago Tribune says it's not alone. In fact, a study by the booksellers' group the Book Industry Study Group also found that sales of both paper and digital books declined across the board, but that digital book sales dropped more than book sales overall. Along the lines of this conversation, the Illinois State Library in Springfield, Ohio, decided to give all of its patrons a digital version of the collection it offers on demand. That provides unique opportunities for audiobooks, radio plays and more, but at least for the three weeks of the experiment, sales were up about 30 percent. It's impossible to know if that would be a temporary phenomenon, but since our original report, three new mobile apps have launched that offer e-books to Kindle owners for free or a flat fee. Although none of them have the reach of Amazon's offering, any additional traction would be a win for the Kindle-using public. One of those companies is named
