Aereo's first streamed broadcast was of a Cubs home game (against the Giants); an event that rival CBS would not air on television, because "the FCC allows cable and satellite operators to carry over-the-air signals from broadcast stations". As with Aereo, the company streams over-the-air television signals. The major difference is that, unlike Aereo, ATSC 3.0 digital television content is stored and cached locally on the user's hard drive. Along with television, ATSC 3.0 broadcasts exist for audio, data services, and other services. According to the Television Technology Research Center, in 2018, ATSC 3.0 will provide: One or more video channels that can include video, TV, or other content; Information for news, weather, radio, or other shows or for other interactive programs; and Data services for services like broadband. As of March 31, 2014, ATSC 3.0 digital television content may be acquired via downloads; there is no catch-up or

IPTV services. History Aereo Beginning in 2005, Aereo, owned by Barry Diller, split off from EchoStar, and was specifically set to enter the marketplace using the ATSC 3.0 specification and the R&S 9200 DVR. ATSC 3.0 is set to begin a new era in television content with its standardization of technology and deliver better resolution on television screens. However, after a number of incidents, litigation and appeals, including rejection by the Federal Communications Commission, and a class action lawsuit in California, Aereo was unable to compete with traditional cable and satellite TV providers in the United States. Its service was completely shut down on July 31, 2012. ATSC 3.0 was developed by the Advanced Television Systems Committee (ATSC) of the Moving Picture Experts Group (MPEG). It has been standardized to cover the United States, Canada and Mexico markets. ATSC 3.0 is used for what the FCC is calling high-definition television (HDTV). The current line-up of ATSC 3.0 signals is in seven digital television (DTV) systems: ISDB-T (Intersymbol

Digital Broadcasting by terrestrial wave), ISDB-T-E (Intersymbol Digital Broadcasting by terrestrially encoded wave), ATSC (Advanced Television Systems Committee, a 1cdb36666d

Which one is better from a user experience standpoint? In which of these two situations (in terms of UX) is better: A process that is known and the user selects what he wants to proceed with in a dialog box that asks for input. A simple (3-4 steps) process with text boxes, buttons etc., that upon a positive selection the user will be forwarded to the next step (in this case creating an event). A process that requires some knowledge/awareness by the user. A user has to choose the "type" of event to be created. There are multiple types (and dozens of attributes for each type) and the user must choose between these and then create it. This whole process is made through multiple screens. The user has multiple screens to return to in order to create the event. Also, there are multiple "pages" that appear upon some completion and/or some failure.

A: Each of the two methodologies is useful in different situations. If your user gets stuck with an
