if that wasn't the case, there are multiple options to get the software you need. the first (and the most secure) would be to pay a few hundred dollars to an on-line vendor and get the software delivered to you. one of the best parts of the on-line vendors is that you can go and get the software whenever you want and you don't have to have a colleague in your institution to help you install it. you might want to check them out. personally i have never had bad experiences with the vendors i have used. now, let's assume the students in your institution are using software on their own machines without the institutional license. if the software is less than 2.0, chances are it has an gratis version available. chances are that this will be pretty easy to use and install. remember, though, that the user actually has to deal with the consequences of using software without an official license. having a semi-cracked mathematica on a workstation that you can't use in any other class may have repercussions. 1. put a note on the door of the office next to the computer room that says that someone needs to install the software and ask for help if there is any problem. chances are that a lot of people in your institution will have mathematica installed on their workstations and you can easily ask them to help you. of course, they might get quite offended and you may get in trouble with the it department. on the other hand, you may end up with another copy of the software on your machine. if the it guys find out about it, they may not be too happy about it.

depending on where you live, you may find work as a database professional in a large or small company or in a government agency. the american society for information science and technology represents database management professionals. the society publishes journal, conference, and workshop proceedings, a professional designation database, and career content. the society sponsors a web page, learning resources, and certification programs that can help you advance in your career. you can earn the certified information systems security professional (cissp) credential through the society. if you are looking for an in-depth tutorial, you can join asis&t's institute. this certification program trains you to assess information risk and protect systems. the program requires an intense workload and other requirements. the association for information systems hosts a professional development network that allows you to network with industry professionals. you can engage in lively discussions and solidify your professional knowledge. this is a valuable way to advance your career. for career information, you can also search the society's online directory to find a professional association near you. if you're seeking a degree program, check with local universities. some offer degree programs in database management. you can also review career information online. some sites, like about.com, feature interactive career guides that provide training tips. the pay for database professionals may fluctuate depending on the education and credentials you have. a bachelor's degree typically yields a higher pay range of $60,000 to $80,000 per year. a master's degree may yield a median pay of $70,000, depending on the certification or position you hold. 5ec8ef588b
