in order to create test step logic, click on the steps drop down list. you will see all the steps you have recorded. you can click on the add button to add a new step or drag and drop an existing step to the editing area. once you have finished adding steps to your test, you need to add them to a test group in order to provide a logical structure to your test. you can add a step to any group you want. to add a step to the my steps group, click on the group drop down list and select my steps. as you can see, test studio provides a very rich feature set for creating, recording, editing and executing your own test cases. the documentation provides more information and usage examples for all of these features. data driven testing is the latest trend in qa and we are currently experiencing more and more qa testers running their tests with data driven testing. with data driven testing, testers can create data objects and use them to write scripts. in addition to writing scripts, you can also use them to run your manual test. data driven testing is considered an example of automation for testing. you can use this approach to improve your testing productivity. data driven testing is not a replacement for manual testing. it is only a replacement for the testing of large numbers of test cases. the testing of web application usually consists of the following steps: design and develop the web application. create a set of test cases that perform different functionalities of the web application. create the test suite that performs all the functionalities of the web application. create a test case for each test scenario that performs a single functionality. run the test case and observe the results.

in addition to these features, the new version offers the following: flexible syntax. improved editing capabilities ability to preview and filter scripts during search and replace. ability to preview and filter scripts during search and replace. flexible reporting. improved support for targetting production servers. the following are a few of the benefits of using test studio: organizational memory: the interface of test studio will never get confusing ease of use: recording and playback scripts are intuitive, easy to implement and easy to maintain quickness: tests are recorded and run using an html form of web browser. scripts are automating any browser, desktop or mobile as mentioned before, you can use any code you like for each step - textfinder, findelement, etc. with our current approach, we are saving information only about the objects our script interacts with. in the next chapter we will use the same approach with data already stored in external storage for verification. testing with selected element is supported by telerik test studio v10 and higher, as mentioned in v10, you can use context menu operation to get element under cursor and then right-click to perform desired operation. i am assuming, you are familiar with this concept of testing. telerik test studio will help you to perform this process efficiently and continuously (preferably). you just need to focus on how to design data that will help in creating "agile" scripts. once that is done, it will take less time for you to write tests rather than to think about how to do it.
