In the end, the Pearl Harbor analogy fails to take account of the factors that were overlooked by US planners. Among them was its own limited wartime experience in the Pacific. In July 1940 President Roosevelt called on the US armed forces to deliver a series of surprise strikes against Japan, one of which would take place at Pearl Harbor, then a vital resupply hub for American forces in the Philippines and China. The initial plan, called Operation Sea Lion, to seize the Marshalls, Caroline, and Mariana Islands, which the Japanese had taken early in the war, collapsed in a series of decision-making errors. US and Filipino forces were badly mauled, and the army lost its most experienced commanders. The future at Pearl Harbor was clearly interrupted. To add to the oddness of this fiasco, MacArthur, the American supreme commander in the Pacific, had also had hoped to use an amphibious feint against the Philippines. MacArthur had some 30,000 troops strategically positioned to make such a strike and assumed the Japanese would be stunned by this abrupt turn of events. Instead, the Japanese counter-sunk his fleet, set the USA fleet on the defensive, and dispatched two new forces to the Far East, one to invade India, the other the far-flung New Guinea territory. An American victory seemed unlikely. Although FDR said the US Armed Forces were ready to continue the war, the US Navy canceled Sea Lion, and the Americans remained on the defensive. This experience was to have long-term strategic effects. 5ec8ef588b
